Getting the motivation to run in the summertime is not easy. Running early or after the sun goes down helps, but the heat and humidity are always there. Running alone often makes it that much tougher to meet your training goals. In a perfect world a running partner would always be available at the same time you are, and their training would mirror yours.

However, in the real world finding the perfect training partner sometimes takes as much work as finding the motivation to lace up the sneakers and head out the door. Luckily, in South Florida there is a solution to the training partner dilemma, your neighborhood run club.

Almost every local running store, such as Runner's Depot, has a run club that meets multiple times per week, both in the mornings and after work, where runners of all abilities can be found. Often days will be designated for different types of workouts such as track and hill work, tempo runs, and long runs. Run clubs are also great when on vacation. Often, I'll call the local running store or run club when traveling out of town and find out when they meet so I can join in on a run or two while away. It's a great way to meet other runners and also gain helpful training knowledge from experienced runners.

Typically, these run clubs will be led by a certified coach or at least a runner with a good working knowledge of running. Having other runners to run with and getting coaching and other useful advice are great motivational tools during some of the toughest months of the year to train. Having others to train with make the miles fly by, even on the toughest days. Run clubs can be especially useful for new runners and runners training for their first long distance race as well.
