Natural Running-

The first week of August, Runner's Edge staff were invited to Newton Headquarters in Boulder, CO for a summit that focused primarily on the 'Natural Running' movement. We attended daily clinics on natural running and meetings on the science and recent research behind it. At this point, many shoe companies such as Newton, Saucony, New Balance, and Brooks (as well as some smaller vendors) have begun to modify their flagship shoes to incorporate a lower heel to toe drop, or ramp angle. According to studies, this lower angle helps promote a more natural forward (or midfoot) contact point with the ground, akin to not having footwear on at all. However, it is still advised to protect one's feet to some degree from the pavement and concrete we face daily in our runs. Natural running emphasizes a quick cadence, forward lean from the ankles, a lifting of the lower leg (not a push-off), and a midfoot landing. If you are interested in learning more, please contact the Runner's Edge for info on our running clinics.
